Re: Customer Success Manager, London

Dear Hiring Team,

I'm writing about the Customer Success Manager role in London.

I use Claude every day and build with Claude Code, so I'd be coming to this as someone who already works with the product rather than someone who'd be learning it once inside. I've built and now run several agents for my own business, covering prospect research, outreach, onboarding content and customer diagnostics. That's given me a practical sense of where these tools genuinely change how work gets done, and just as importantly, where people hit friction and quietly give up. Most of customer success in this category is the second thing.

For the last fifteen years I've worked in client-facing roles across the full cycle. I started in new business at Informa, Euromoney and the Financial Times, then moved into account management and customer success. Most recently I spent four years at Coursera looking after roughly $11M in ARR across 30 strategic accounts, including Volkswagen Group, Novartis, HSBC and BBVA, where I delivered 90%+ renewals and 125% net revenue retention. Before that I spent four years at Wiley/CrossKnowledge doing similar work across EMEA and LATAM.

Both Coursera and Wiley are US-headquartered, and in both I was the London-based person owning European accounts. That meant working across time zones, carrying what EMEA customers actually needed back into roadmap conversations with a US product team, and being the local face of a company whose centre of gravity sat somewhere else. From what I can tell, that's close to the position Anthropic's EMEA team is in at the moment.

I've also built things from nothing rather than inheriting them. At Coursera I wrote the health scoring and measurement framework the team worked from, along with much of the process documentation and playbooks. Since 2025 I've been co-founding Pressure Calibration, where the go-to-market, the onboarding architecture and the customer-facing playbooks are all mine. If the EMEA function is still being shaped, I'd rather help shape it than wait for a process to be handed to me.

The reason I want this job specifically is that enterprises are going to adopt this technology whether or not they do it well, and the difference between the two comes down to who is sitting with them while they work it out. I'd like that to be my work.

I'd welcome the chance to talk.
